

Experienced Journalist

How will you generate additional sources for this story?

Or should we call you famous? In the last 15 years you have built up quite a name. You are a well-known journalist. People admire your bold way of working and would very much like to contribute to your work. On a regular basis, you receive interesting information from new sources from all over the country (and beyond).

Unfortunately, your success comes with a downside. As you have written publications on fraudulent collusions and corruption before, you are also known by many of your potential research objects. You already took some precautions regarding the safety of yourself, your belongings and your research.

How do you create an impact back home?

Just when you were thinking you would be working on that one mega boring article forever, there was that perfect phone call from Petronia. Your old friend from university, currently working for Deltora magazine, is looking for extra support with a new research project. You're looking forward to working on something completely different.

Your country is home to several large petrochemical corporations. You've been helping to find sources and collect data remotely for some time now, but now seems the right time to get even more involved in the research.

Are you ready to pack your bag?

Ambitious Newbie

How can you use this opportunity to give yourself a head-start in journalism?

Are you ready to get started? After your degree in finance and economics – interesting stuff, but you have no intention to become an accountant – you have found your true purpose in life: saving the world from bad people.

Okay, you know that it's a bit ambitious to save the world, but you are motivated to help out other journalists and activists in their work. Today will be your first day as part of the editorial team of Deltora.

Consulting Expert

How can you use this opportunity to make a little (or a large) buck on the side?

Finance is really your thing, you love to check annual reports, banking and complete accounting reports. You only have one mission: detecting errors. In the past, when you were working for a large consultancy firm, people sometimes called you a 'data monster'.

What your colleagues did not know is that you did not only encounter innocent mistakes in those data, but also interesting (or dubious) investments could be traced. You have not done anything about it for a long time, but now that you are self-employed, you are invited by journalists working for Deltora to help them with the investigation.

Activist

How can you use this investigation to best serve your personal aims as an activist?

You are through with it! For years, your community has had to live with the consequences of bad government. The government seems to have no idea that the soil is polluted and the environment is deteriorating rapidly. "Why don't they take steps to solve these problems?" It's a mystery to you.

In recent years, you have gathered a group of like-minded people around you. You organise weekly meetings in the small eatery run by you and your family and as an organisation you begin to get an ever louder voice. It is time for a major move!

Editor-in-chief of Deltora

How can I best protect our business interests during and after this investigation?

Take a good look around you: this group of people is kind of your responsibility. As the editor-in-chief of Deltora, a popular magazine, you can decide what will be published. This may sound like a great job, but in the current political climate it is quite a challenge.

In recent years, Deltora has developed into a quality magazine, in which the discovery of political scandals in particular, sells well. In short, the government is not very happy with you. The local industrial sector, on the other hand, are very pleased with your work, as working with non-corrupt government officials makes their lives easier as well.
